Sex show that helps the young...

Presenter Anna
Richardson:
not at all embarrassed

LETTER OF THE WEEK

Many people have demonised Channel 4's controversial The Sex Education Show: Am I Normal? (5-8 July).

I have to disagree with anyone who criticises it, as it takes an honest, unique and comic approach to a subject still found awkward by many.

It may appeal to teenagers like myself because of its name, but it also supplies the information we need to not be confused or nervous about sex. Unlike our teachers, the presenter Anna Richardson has an open-minded approach and never acts at all embarrassed or shows any signs of feeling awkward.

In answer to the question in the subtitle, Am I Normal?, it's said throughout that everyone is. This is very reassuring for adolescents, many of whom are freaked out by a media that glamorises size-zero models and tall, thin alpha males.

I really hope this show has reached out to other teenagers and helped bury insecurities.
